The nurse-patient relationship is a dynamic, mutually defined dyad in which psychiatric nurses use their personality, interpersonal skills, and knowledge of psychiatric nursing practice to establish a therapeutic alliance with the patient (Wilson, 1988). In an inpatient setting, the nursing role is not limited, nor protected, by the boundaries of the therapy hour.

Staff countertransference to borderline patients on an inpatient unit